Thoughts on Learning Styles

I think that learning styles are what make people unique because the world can't rely on only one kind of learning style. I, for one, am mostly a tactile learner, which makes sense because I like to be very hands-on when learning. The different ways we learn affect how it gets absorbed into our brains. Like if someone were to start playing piano and they relied on their ear to understand and compose most of their music. As opposed to someone who relies on sheet music while playing for the visual cues that it gives them. Both have the same outcome, but I think that they understand it differently because they learned through different means. In a group setting, for example, whenever there is diversity in learning styles, the opportunities to create and open new doors are more likely to happen.
